Description:

Play is one of the fundamental ways we engage with, negotiate and appropriate the world around us. This has always been true, but has new and interesting implications in a world increasingly defined by digital technologies and digital agents such as AIs. In this seminar, we will consider how playfulness has shaped the mediatised world, what it means to play in a digital society, and how to design for play. We will explore how making playful things and appropriating technology in playful ways both lead to a deeper theoretical and critical understanding of the deeply mediatised world and how it operates. This is a hands-on seminar in which we will be making playful things and doing playful things.
